

Why Is Your Case Taking So Long? USCIS Processing Delays Have Now Hit Crisis-Levels

Why Hasn't Your Case Been Decided Yet?

Nationwide, you and millions of families, businesses and also people applying for humanitarian relief are waiting longer for U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to process and approve your applications and petitions.

Five years ago, an average case was taking about five months to process. By Fiscal Year (FY) 2018, that same applicant waited nearly 10 months. Those extra months of waiting halt business operations, keep families separated, and jeopardize people's lives.

Who Is Affected?

You and other people applying for family-based benefits, employment-based benefits, naturalization, travel documents, and employment authorization are all experiencing delays. In FY 2018, a staggering 94 percent of all immigration petitions and application form types took longer to process when compared to FY 2014.

USCIS PROCESSING TIMES ARE ON THE RISE

WHILE OVERALL CASE RECEIPTS ARE ON THE DECLINE

Why Are Cases Taking Longer?

Many factors can slow down your case. New policies at USCIS are restricting legal immigration. For example, one policy requires USCIS officers to conduct duplicate reviews of past decisions adding unnecessary work to each case.

Such inefficient policies help explain why processing times are increasing even as USCIS application rates are decreasing. Recent USCIS data shows that USCIS's average processing time rose by 19% from FY 2017 to FY 2018, even while overall numbers of case receipts declined by 13 percent during that same period.

Congress intended USCIS to function as a service-oriented agency on behalf of the American people. But the agency is failing its mission with unacceptably and increasingly slow case processing.
